Excerpt: . idealization of childhood, the same yearning for its departed and dimly remembered joy so frequently also found in Wordsworth:1 Let me mirror me in days of yore, Knowing neither Truth nor blasting Lie, Pure as snow, I in the pure sun lay, While the veil o'er childhood's untaught eye Kindly barred the glaring light of day. O thou vanish'd glee! Call st over wood and lea, Soft as quail's faint note from far away. A number of Keller's later characters are by no means distantly related to the wanderers and vagabonds who occasionally appear in his early romantic poetry. Green Henry, Pankraz, Strabinski, all have something of the romantic search for the blue flower, and in this respect in a sense belong to the same genre as Heinrich von Ofterdingen, Eichendorff's Taugenichts, Peter Schlemiehl, etc. VWhile Keller...
