OCLC Number: (OCoLC)45424094 Subject: Competition. Excerpt: . . . 15 viable option for most businesses. Thus, although EDIs have been automating business-to-business transactions for more than a decade, primarily large firms have been the beneficiaries of 16 their savings. Even for those businesses that could afford EDI systems, the underlying reliance on private networks resulted in significant constraints on the service that EDIs could provide. Some 17 concluded that such EDIs do not provide market transparency or allow for market growth. EDI supports a series of bilateral relationships rather than multilateral, dynamic relationships. Both the lack of transparency and market growth are largely attributable to the necessity of establish ing 18 an individual connection with every business partner. 2. Internet The Internet makes B2Bs possible. It is an extremely efficient mechanism for the 19 exchange of information in light of its pervasiveness and the ease of connectivity. This type of connectivity is possible due in large part to extensible mark-up language (XML), which is the 20 business-to-business e-commerce alphabet. Through the Internet, businesses with differing MRP and ERP systems or computer hardware can access the universal browser without complex 21 installations. Small businesses unable to independently develop a viable e-commerce strategy could use B2Bs to leverage a public infrastructure from someone else to achieve its e-22 commerce goals. In sum, t he rapid and transformative growth of B2B e-marketplaces is attributable to the widespread adoption of the Internet, combined with new trading software and 23 lower computing costs. Internet technology affords sharing of an unprecedented level of information about the complete activities of the customers in the marketplace among sellers and buyers that participate 15 E....
