The head-dress is another most important article; this, however, is fully treated on in the paper marked A. , as well as the other particulars of dress, camp management, and c, in the suggestions, to which I trust not to be thought presumptuous in drawing the attention of the Commissioners. There are some other material points which I trust to be excused for drawing more particular attention to, viz. , the tender age at which recruits are enlisted and at once put to work. This most unwise and impolitic measure may be unavoidable during the press of war, but it is even then of doubtful utility, and as a general rule no soldier should be sent to India under the age of twenty, and after two yearstraining. I do not here mean so much the training to arms as to the new life that...
